four crew members of a simulated Mars mission emerged on Saturday after completing 378 days in isolation at NASA's Johnson Space Center in Houston, an endeavour aimed at preparing astronauts for future interplanetary travel.

The crew comprised mission commander Ross Elder, medical officer Ellen Ellis, science officer Matthew Montgomery, and flight engineer James Spicer. They entered the 1,700-square-foot 3D-printed habitat on Oct 19, 2025. Throughout the project, the team performed tasks including growing crops in simulated Martian soil and communicating with NASA officials under time delays that mimicked deep-space conditions.

"It's been a hell of a year, outside. She highlighted the importance of maintaining US leadership in space and expanding lunar research. Elder remarked that while the risks of Mars exploration are significant, putting humans on the red planet is achievable through fortitude and hard work.

The crew will spend two weeks participating in post-mission evaluations and debriefings. NASA seeks data on how long-duration missions affect health, productivity, and team

Analog (CHAPEA) program, following a similar 378-day project spanning 2023 and 2024.

Johnson Space Center Director Vanessa Wyche welcomed the crew, commending their ability to manage limited resources and adapt to operational delays. Wyche noted that the lessons learned from the mission will help shape upcoming spaceflights to the moon and pave the way for human missions to Mars in the 2030s.

his resignation on Monday following the collapse of budget negotiations within his five-party coalition government. King Philippe has withheld his decision on whether to accept the resignation. A palace statement noted that the King regrets the lack of an agreement capable of addressing Belgium's economic challenges. King Philippe plans to hold consultations with party leaders starting on Tuesday, ahead of another meeting with De Wever on Friday.
